The acoustic startle response is a normal reflex that helps maintain the safety of the body and can be evoked by sudden and unexpected auditory stimuli. Although it is commonly used in research, it has not been used clinically, because it is sometimes difficult to manipulate its amplitude, which can be quite large. We report here the effects of sudden and unexpected music as acoustic stimuli in patients who had sustained a mild head injury, on the acoustic startle response elicited by noise pulses in the background. The patients responded to music but not to noise pulses, but we found good correlations between the volume of the music and the amplitude of the acoustic startle response. Moreover, we found that music with slower rhythms caused significantly higher amplitudes of the acoustic startle response than music with faster rhythms. This suggests that using harmonic motion resonance as a stimulating tool to induce the acoustic startle response is promising. The feasibility of this approach may be clinically useful.Q: Is there a way to set an arbitrarily large number 09e8f5149f
