Mast cells (MCs) have been described in the human gastrointestinal tract (GIT), but their functional significance is not known. We have studied the mast cells of the human GIT in 10 subjects with systemic mastocytosis (SM). In a large proportion of cases, the mast cells were very homogeneous or nearly homogeneous. MCs were scattered throughout the whole GIT, including the esophagus, and not only in the submucosa. In some areas, they were more numerous than the connective tissue mast cells. MCs were also induced in the normal mur
