TweakPower is an easy to use utility that will optimize your computer by cleaning history, speeding up programs and internet browser, and giving your computer a spic and span makeover. The program uses an easy to understand interface that is highly customizable. With no customization, the app automatically runs tasks and surveys your computer's resource. Once setup, the program is easy to use and produces fast, clean results. Simulate new keystrokes in your web browser using the Pepper spray technique, or send instant notifications to your contacts when you login to a protected page with Killswitch. Keystroke Simulator is a bit of a niche application, as most people wouldn't need such a tool. But if you're a privacy geek and enjoy deep inspection, that's a pretty handy feature to have in your browser. The program won't modify your browser history or change your default search, though, so don't worry. It runs in the background and captures all the keystrokes you enter in a specific browser.

You'll then be able to store those keystrokes in the file for later use. You can then instruct a specific browser to use those keystrokes instead of its own or to save them on the user's system for future use. This is handy for things like automatically logging into an account at a site that uses HTTPS, or logging into sites that require a secret word, or for sites that utilize multiple passwords. This is also great for taking notes on a site, or logging a user into a website that doesn't record IP addresses, etc. It won't work with password-protected sites, but it's perfect for the countless sites that don't record your IP address and require a form of log-in. You can choose to store keystrokes on the system, use them to log into a site, or use them as a password. Of course, you can also use the files you've created to "mass-kill" accounts, share those files with your contacts or save them to a file for instant use. In addition to keystrokes, the program can capture site domain names, usernames, passwords, and even more, so you can even store all that for later use. Simply copy and paste the "list" into another tab and tweak it as needed. Keystroke Simulator can be used for all sorts of stuff. But to

Can't figure out which network adapters should go on which port? While a typical Windows Server 2012 networking installation has the network adapters connected to specific physical network ports, the functionality of the hardware itself can be changed without requiring changes to the network configuration. If you want to change the settings of a specific network adapter, you need to know its physical location on the network. There are two ways to find out the location of a specific network adapter. The first option is to use the Windows Server Resource Kit to get a list of all of the network adapters that are installed in the system. The second option is to use the Get-NetAdapter cmdlet to get a list of all of the network adapters that are installed in the system and then filter the list by a specific property to identify the specific network adapter you want to find.
